

STYLE | FASHION | SOCIAL

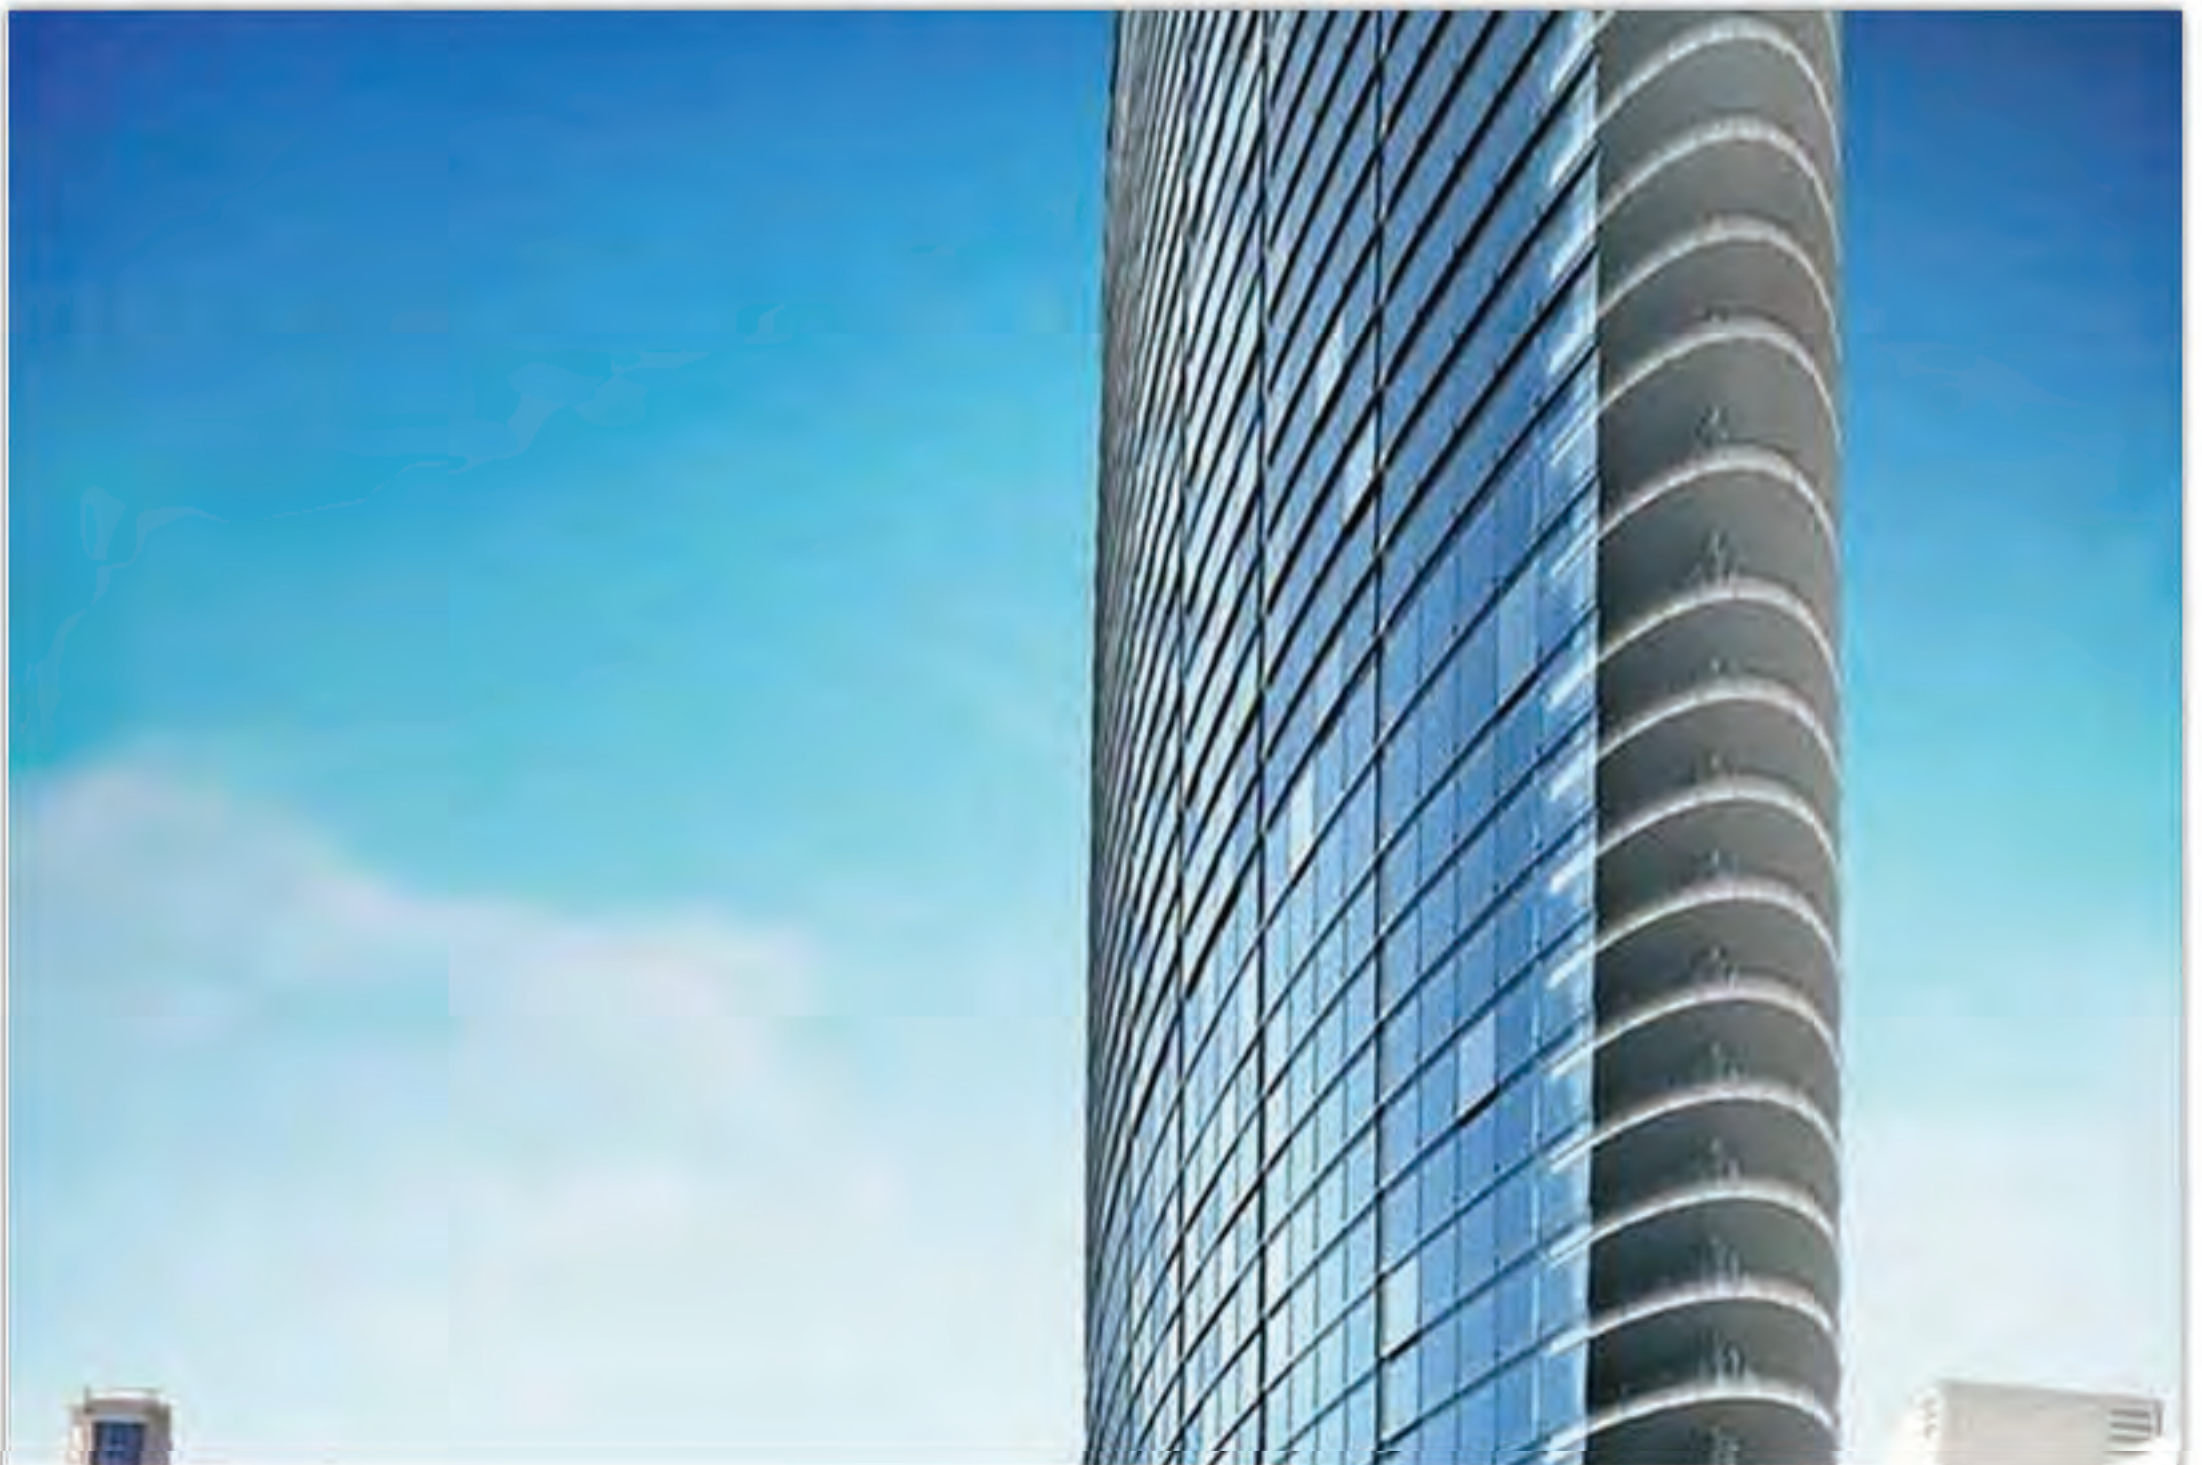

Papercity

ALL | HOUSTON | DALLAS

HOME PARTIES SOCIAL CALENDAR FASHION HOUSE & DESIGN ARTS

home / house & design / Museum Tower's Design à Trois

Museum Tower's Design à Trois

Christina Geyer

Posted: January 11, 2012

Going up? Local designers Emily Summers, Ann Schooler and Marco French certainly are. Each of the interior-design masterminds has been given his or her own place at the under-construction Museum Tower in Downtown — sans signing on the dotted line. While Summers, Schooler and French may not be taking up permanent residence at the much-anticipated tower, they will be wielding their decorating wands, each styling a show home inside the glass-encased, 42-story high-rise designed by Los Angeles architect Scott Johnson. Exact details are still under wraps for the trio of pied-à-terres that will open early this year, but we can only envision three distinctly different design concepts. From Summers, we expect nothing less than a space inspired by art and architecture, with no end to restrained glam. As for Schooler, perhaps she'll debut a decidedly Southern showpiece, filled with rich antiques and well-designed frills. And from French? We predict a contemporary condominium filled with his signature warm drama, yet imminently liveable. It's true what they say: Good things do come in threes. Museum Tower Sales Gallery, 2112 Flora St., 214.954.1234; museumtowerdallas.com.

Image: Work of art: a rendering of downtown's new Museum Tower